The Fishermen

Matthew 4:12-25; Mark 1:14-20

By the sixteenth verse of Mark's first chapter Jesus is on the shore of Galilee. There were ample fishing grounds at the head of the lake, and the men who fished the deep waters were among those influenced by John who had preached his fiery sermons far down the same rift valley. From the fishermen of Galilee Christ called His first disciples.

It was a prosperous and hard-working group of men. They were not wealthy, but comfortable enough; and above all, self-employed and independent, no oppressed and exploited class servile or bitter over their lot. The choice was deliberate. It would have been easy enough in those days of fierce nationalism and class division to collect a horde of the resentful and dispossessed such as David gathered round him in the Adullam cave. But such men were not the material the Lord sought. Those men were to preach a spiritual gospel, not to spearhead a revolutionary movement—a fact to be borne in mind by groups of exotic Christians today.

"Christ," wrote George Adam Smith, "went to a trade which had no private wrongs, and called men, not from their dreams, but from work they were contented to do from day to day till something higher should touch them. And so it has come to pass that, not the jargon of the fanatics and brigands of the highlands of Galilee, but the speech of the fishermen of the lake, and the instruments of their simple craft, have become the language and symbolism of Christianity."

"... fishers of men." It is a vivid image. Peter and Andrew knew the silver heap which turned and tumbled in the straining net as the boats drew them heavily toward the steep beach. They also knew the empty haul, and the whole wet night's labor wasted in unrewarded toil. They knew the bream coming up one by one on the handline—the bream which carried its young in its capacious mouth, and, when they left, adjusted a temporary imbalance with a pebble—or perhaps a lost coin. They understood the figure of speech. We shall meet them again at their higher fishing.
