LITURGICAL QUESTION: THE BREAD OF THE EUCHARIST by Archpriest David M. Petras

There is a fundamental difference between the Roman and Byzantine liturgical experiences of bread. We know, certainly, that the Roman Church uses unleavened bread, while the Byzantine Church uses leavened bread.

What has developed is that the Roman priest is able to obtain the bread for the Liturgy from a common source, usually from Church supply companies. It comes pre-packaged and ready to use in a very convenient form.

The Byzantine Church uses leavened bread, that is, bread that is baked with yeast. The bread is usually called prospora, = "that which is offered." This results in a quite different practice: there are no central altar supply companies for prospora, and so each parish must make its own bread. I see this as a blessing - for the eucharist then becomes truly a community concern. Either the priest himself or a designated parishioner must make the bread. It is therefore much more personal.

Our parishioners here at Annunciation usually meet in the Parish Kitchen to bake our Prospora (that which is offered) for 2 months. Let Nina or Christian know that you would like to help make and learn about Baking Prospora.
